The static "two point" threshold and the dynamic "forced-choice" thresholds for tactile detection in a laboratory set-up were measured in a group of normal blind subjects. It was found that the normal blind subjects demonstrated a "tactile transition" at threshold loads of 15 g or more, approximately the same as the static threshold. In this transition the sensitivity (dynamic threshold/static threshold) remained constant. The transitions did not occur at loads corresponding to the dynamic threshold of sighted subjects. The results support the hypothesis of normal tactile transition in the blind. The force-dependent sensitivity of the vibratory system in blind and normally sighted individuals is discussed.In line with the continued globalization of the economy, the trend in medical technology to provide the modern medical services to patients residing in regions other than their original regional area is increasing year by year. The typical example of this is the provision of medical services in a foreign language. In addition, the technologies essential to the medical treatment of patients, such as CT scans or MRI in magnetic resonance imaging, are also required to be performed in the hospitals specialized for the examination by patients. For this reason, there is also an increasing need for medical professionals with medical language skills to be located in other regions. There are two different methods of obtaining medical professionals with medical language skills. One of them is to develop medical care services in other countries and the other is to recruit medical professionals from the developed countries. In general, the latter is more preferable for the development of health care in these developing countries. This is because the employment conditions for medical personnel in developing countries differ from those of developed countries. The reason is that education requires a long period and costs a lot of money, which is not common in developing countries. However, because of these differences in employment conditions, the provision of a medical care service tends to be very difficult. One of the reasons for this is the language spoken by patients in developing countries. This includes not only the use of different languages, but also those for the medical professions. A major problem for providing medical services in a foreign language is that a medical professional

The polyamine spermidine is involved in the modulation of ASK1/2 signaling and hypoxia-inducible factors (HIF). Spermidine and its precursor putrescine inhibit both the TGFβ1-ALK5 signaling axis and the hypoxia-induced transcription factor hypoxia-inducible factor (HIF). In hypoxia, putrescine suppresses prolyl hydroxylase activity in a spermidine oxidase-dependent manner through an increase in redox potential. As a result, HIF becomes hydroxylated and dissociates from its transcription factor p300 to translocate into the nucleus, where it activates transcription of its target genes (VEGF, HGF, and erythropoietin (Epo)) that are involved in cell proliferation, survival, survival, angiogenesis, and adaptation to hypoxia.MySS ￭ Select the tools that you want to use in this notebook.
