He is best known for his no-hitter against the New York Mets on August 14,. Ponce was drafted by the California Angels in the eighth round of the 1981 Major League Baseball Draft out of the University of Texas El Paso. Ponce was used sparingly by the Angels for their minor league farm system teams, and was traded to the Milwaukee Brewers as part of a trade that sent Luis Polonia to the Angels. Ponce's career in the Brewers' minor league system was unspectacular, but he became a major league starter in 1991 after the Brewers were so impressed with his performance that they recalled him for the final games of the season. In 1992, Ponce helped the Brewers to win their first National League West division title since. Ponce made his major league debut on September 19., against the Milwaukee Brewers. In his first season, he went 8-9 in 23 games (16 starts), with a 4.13 ERA and a 1.47 WHIP. Ponce was called up to the majors again in, where he had a 10.17 ERA and a 1.92 WHIP. He was released by the Brewers during the off-season. He signed with the Seattle Mariners, but was released after 6 games. Ponce went 1-1 with a 4.09 ERA in six games for the St. Louis Cardinals, and signed with the Toronto Blue Jays, making his final major league appearance on July 9, against the Florida Marlins. He pitched in five games for the Blue Jays and, in the final game of the season, he gave up only one hit and struck out the side in the twelfth inning to break up a no-hitter.
